

Case Insense: Onboarding

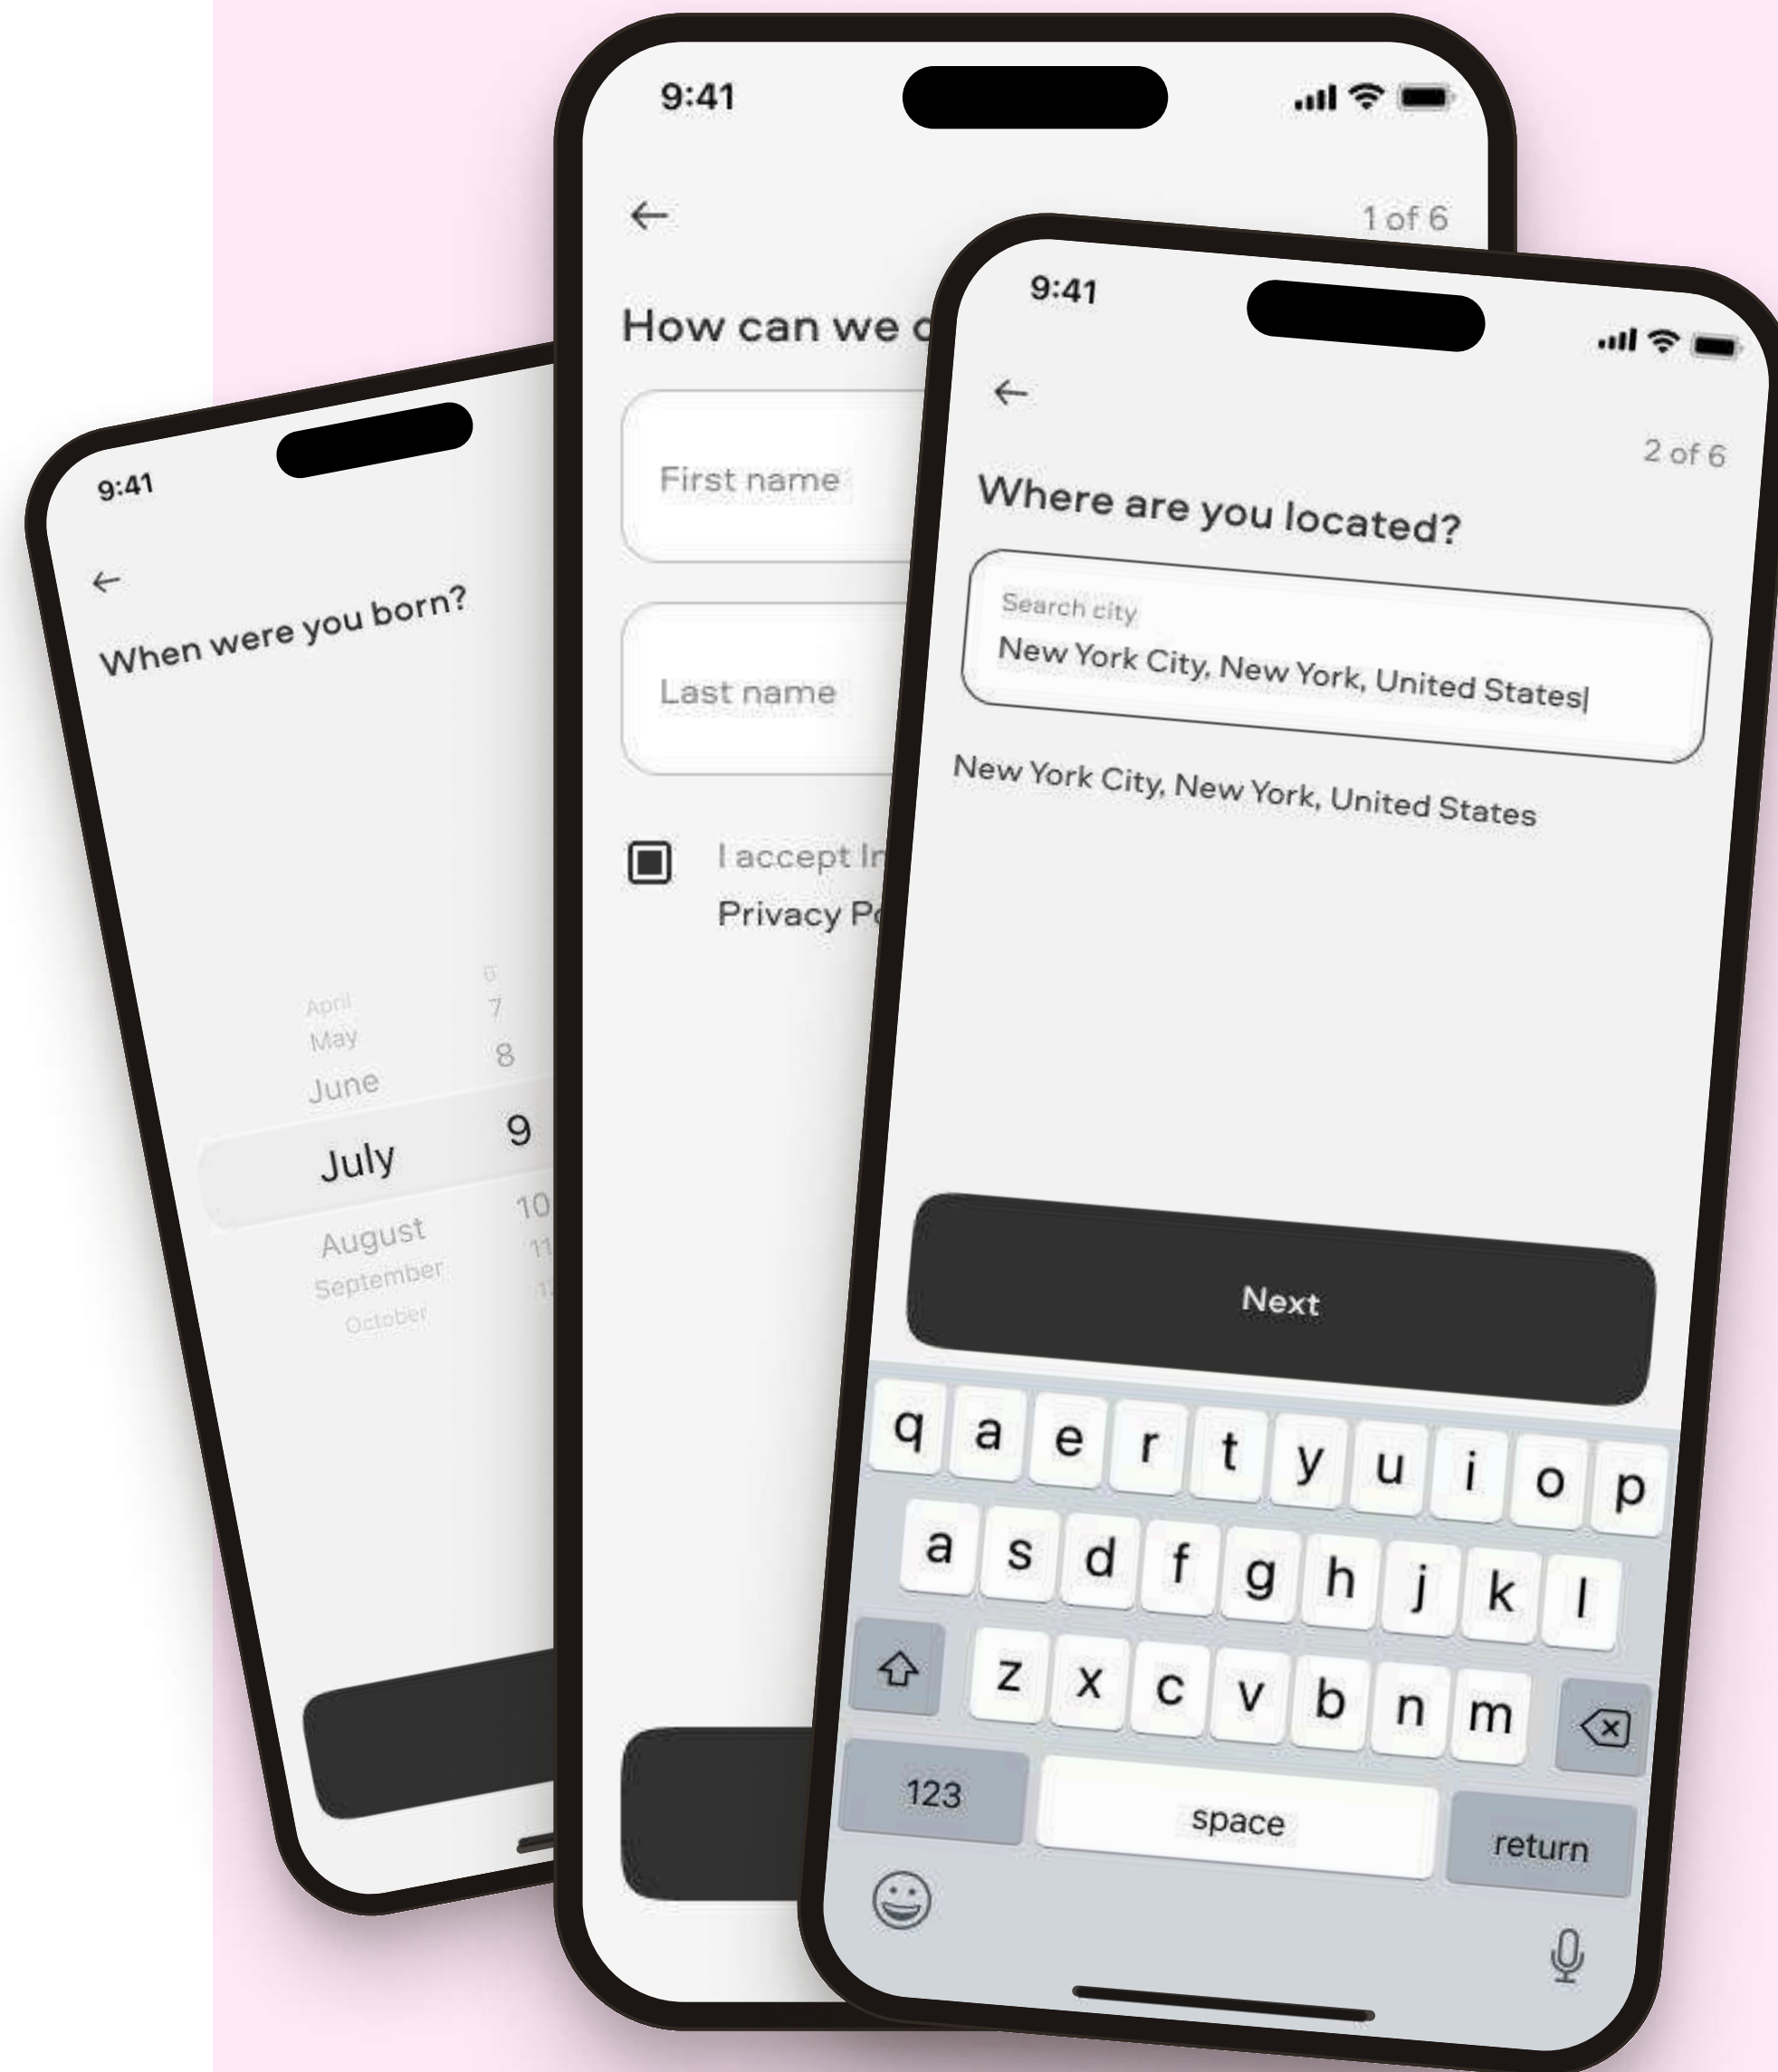

Business context

2025:Baseline

Insense is a two-sided marketplace where brands hire creators and creators apply for campaigns. Every abandoned onboarding reduced the number of searchable, campaign-ready creator profiles available to brands.

Business needs

Brands subscribe to Insense to create campaigns and hire creators. To help brands find the right creators, creators need to complete onboarding with the information required to match campaign requirements.

DIAGNOSIS

The issue was not simply the number of questions. It was the perceived cost of answering them

A step-by-step review surfaced three recurring reasons creators could hesitate, slow down, or leave the flow

01

Unclear value

Users were asked for profile data before the benefit of sharing it was always obvious.

02

High effort

Some steps felt heavier than the progress or value they appeared to unlock.

03

Trust concerns

Sensitive or important questions needed more context to feel justified.

Three signals revealed the same friction

Product data, competitor patterns, and creator immersion pointed to one issue: creators were asked for effort before understanding the value of answering.

PRODUCT DATA

Amplitude

Drop-off increased where the value of answering was unclear.

PATTERN SCAN

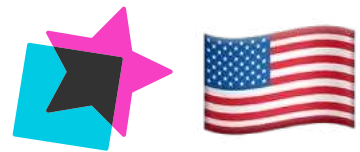

Competitor flows

Compared how other products explain value during onboarding.

CONTEXT

Creator immersion

Experienced creator setup and expectations first-hand.

Users continued when the value exchange was clear

Each step was rewritten to make the exchange explicit: why the information is needed, how it improves relevance, and what the creator receives in return.

OUTCOME

32%→ 18% onboarding drop off

Reducing drop-off from 32% to 18% increased the number of campaign-ready creators. More creators could apply for campaigns, giving brands a stronger pool of talent to launch their campaigns successfully.
